EVERY HIDDEN THING BY KENNETH OPPEL

"If [my father] hadn't belted Professor Cardland that night in the Academy of Natural Sciences, I wouldn't have had the chance to see Rachel's eyes up close." The first time Samuel Bolt and Rachel Cardland meet, it's over their fathers' flying fists. Professors Bolt and Cardland are battling paleontologists, each determined to be the best at unearthing centuries old dinosaur bones from the unforgiving rock of the American West. So when Professor Cardland challenges Professor Bolt's latest find in front of a fascinated audience, the gloves come off and Rachel and Samuel are forced to wade in and pull their fathers apart. That's their first memorable meeting, but it isn't their last. Soon they are each on an expedition with their fathers that end up being only a few miles apart in the backwoods of Wyoming. Against all odds, and unbeknownst to their mad dads, the two intrepid teens not only share information about their respective digs but soon fall in love. Adamant about being together, the lovers hatch a daring plan to discover and cash in on the greatest dinosaur find of all time—the Tyrannosaurus Rex—and leave their fathers behind in the desert dust. Meanwhile, their expeditions are being closely watched by a Sioux party who are none too happy about the fact that Rachel's father desecrated one of their sacred sites. Can Rachel and Samuel find the label? Tense romance before their fathers or the Sioux hunting party find them? More romance than adventure, this story moves a bit slower than some of Oppel's other intriguing works, which range from a prehistoric space story to a strangeball post-apocalypse. But what Oppel lacks in pacing, he more than makes up for in characterization, especially when it comes to
